

Trump summons top tech leaders for a round table

Agenda is undisclosed and perhaps still under consideration

San Francisco, Dec 7

DURING the long presidential campaign, the most resolutely anti-Trump part of the country was the narrow strip of land south of this city.

Silicon Valley shunned the Republican candidate and all he stood for. It mobilised its technology for his defeat and warned of dire consequences if he should somehow win.

Now that the impossible has happened, tech's day of reckoning is here - next Wednesday afternoon, to be precise. The president-elect is summoning leaders of the biggest tech companies to New York for a round-table discussion, according to a transition official who has seen the invitations.

The agenda is undisclosed and perhaps still under consideration, but it is unlikely to produce the sort of love fest that existed between president Obama and Silicon Valley. Tech culture celebrates disruption as the tool that produces a better future for all.

How to reconcile these views is the task of Peter Thiel, the billionaire investor and Facebook board member whose role is to formulate a tech policy for the new administration. Thiel secured this position by making a contrarian bet on Trump's candidacy, which paid off. The round-table invitations are from Thiel, Jared Kushner, Trump's son-in-law, and Rince Priebus, the incoming chief of staff.

If the past is any precedent, Trump might suggest or even order the tech overlords to do what he thinks necessary. The president-elect met on Tuesday with Masayoshi Son, the founder and chief executive of SoftBank Group, which recently created a new investment fund that could invest up to $100 billion in tech companies worldwide. Afterwards,

Trump posted on Twitter that Son agreed to invest $50 billion in the US and create "50,000 new jobs." Two Silicon Valley CEOs appeared willing to test the waters: Safra Catz of Oracle, confirmed her participation in next week's meeting with Trump. So did Chuck Robbins of Cisco Systems. Representatives for other leading tech companies declined to comment.

Thiel has said in interviews that the benefits accruing to tech investors like himself should be more widely shared outside a few ZIP codes in New York and around San Francisco. One role of the meeting is to spur ideas for changing this situation. A spokesman for Thiel declined to comment.

Chris Sacca, a prominent venture investor, said there was only one path for those attending next week's meeting: defiance. "If an attendee wants to maintain their integrity and preserve their company's ability to recruit the best talent, then there is only one purpose for a trip to Trump Tower: to deliver the message that our industry will not be complicit in the systematic disgrace of our democratic institutions," Sacca said.
